Otis Dozier painted a certain time and place into existence. Ostensibly, his subject was the flora and fauna of the American Southwest, but his true subject was the universality of the rhythms of the natural world. His mantra was "Look for the universal in the regional." What a contrast with the current cliché "global art," which, in essence, means "follow fashion and money!" Otis's "universal" was beyond the ego, beyond the subjective. And, although someday his works, like all landscape painting, will become images of a vanished world, a time no one remembers, what a treasure they are for us! Could any of us see the exquisite design of Southwestern flora or the geometry of native rock formations echoed in fair weather clouds if not for his paintings? His tools were a gift for drawing, an infallible color sense, and an insatiable curiosity.
